SYNOPSIS

Democracy is in crisis. A new generation of elected leaders are dismantling freedom and democracy as we know it.

Filmed over three years in five countries, FREEDOM FOR THE WOLF is an epic investigation into this new regime. From the young students of Hong Kong, to a rapper in post-Arab Spring Tunisia and the viral comedians of Bollywood, we discover how people from every corner of the globe are fighting the same struggle. They are fighting against elected leaders who trample on human rights, minorities, and their political opponents.

Philosopher Isaiah Berlin warned against this political hijacking long ago, "freedom for the wolves has often meant death for the sheep."

Now the wolves are on the rise.
Can they be defeated?

THE PRODUCTION

Filming began in August 2014 in Hong Kong and wrapped at 2am, June 22, 2017, the evening of the Women's March on Washington. This period stretched from the Umbrella Revolution in Hong Kong to Trump's inauguration.

Rupert Russell and his producers, Camilla Hall and Patrick Hamm, filmed in five countries – Tunisia, India, Japan, Hong Kong, United States – over three continents. In their search for the modern meaning of freedom, they interviewed pro-China politicians, leaders of the Muslim Brotherhood, Hindu nationalist vigilantes, Tunisian rappers, Bollywood comedians, and Trump-voting autoworkers. They attended Hindu rallies, Salafi demonstrations, Republican fundraisers, and illegal Japanese dance parties. They were tear-gassed on the streets of Hong Kong and Washington D.C.

The team fused these character-driven vignettes together with interviews with leading academics: Francis Fukuyama and Larry Diamond, of Stanford University, and Lawrence Lessig and Orlando Patterson, of Harvard University. Their arguments were brought to cinematic life with animations created by a team of artists in Poland at DARE Studio.

Countries filmed in:

DIRECTOR INTERVIEW

Why did you make this film?

I was fixated with one question: can ideas shape the world? After studying sociology at Harvard University as a PhD student for seven years, I still wasn't sure and wanted to find out. Which idea has been more powerful in shaping the modern world than "freedom?"

Why do you find the concept of "freedom" so interesting?

Freedom is the ultimate paradox. In 2014, when I started making this film, ISIS was on the rise. Its origin? The peaceful protests in Syria during the freedom-loving Arab Spring. Freedom has a habit of promoting and promising freedom and then delivering the opposite.

You mix vérité and essay style – which genre is this?

The most frequent comment I get from people who see the film is that it plays like an "intellectual horror movie." I think that sums up what's inside my head most days.

How has the work of your father, Ken Russell, influenced you?

Dad made no apologies about taking on big ideas or intellectual subjects. But at the same time, no one ever said his films were boring. I try to do the same.

Do protests work?

Yes! The Women's Marches of January, 2017, have been incredibly successful already. The grassroots organizations that came from these marches are what have given women the spaces, opportunities, and platforms to begin to articulate and report sexual harassment and assault. The marches provided the opportunity for the #metoo movement and can take credit for the men already removed from power – and the many still to go.

Why did you film in Hong Kong?

Hong Kong is the future. When China suffers an inevitable recession and is forced to implement some democratic “reforms,” it will be the Hong Kong model of managed democracy that will be rolled out. And as existing democracies are becoming more authoritarian and authoritarian governments are becoming more democratic, they will all begin to resemble the illiberal democracy imposed on the Hong Kong people right now.

Why did you film in India and Tunisia?

Most pundits in the West not only overlook Tunisia and India, but hold them up as success cases of the “Western model” of liberal democracy. I find this celebratory stance profoundly narcissistic: in wanting to see our own reflection around the world, we opt to keep one eye shut and not look too closely. Because, what you will find, as we did, is that these “success” cases are in crisis too - sharply turning away from democracy and towards authoritarianism.
